

Overall, I am pretty happy with how my project 1 turned out. I did want to make it persistent, but that wasn't at the top of my priorities as I really wanted to focus on the design and interface of this app and challenge myself that way. I do hope to add persistence soon. I think by struggling through certain things I have been able to learn a lot about app development and problem solving, which has been very beneficial. I think I have also started to realize that there isn't really such thing as a "simple" app and that things can get (and usually does) get complicated very quickly, which makes me realize how important it is to really plan things out before starting and to be able to solve problems and be flexible.